Lichens are organisms formed as a result of the symbiosis of fungus and algae or fungus, algae and cyanobacteria or fungus and cyanobacteria.

Lichens are important for the biosphere. They settle on rocky and sandy terrain, where there is no soil, and participate in its formation. Lichens also form living conditions for other organisms.

A man uses lichens to obtain dyes, sugar, alcohol and some medicinal substances.

Lichens are the first living organisms to suffer from air pollution. Their reaction to air pollution is used in the lichen-indication method for assessment of the degree of air pollution in cities and in forests.
